

077 54 PHIL;CRIT THE SITUATION "I. The Collapse of Truth and Narrative Consistency

In today's world - there is little to be desired in terms of truth value and narrative consistency. Competing narratives that contradict each-other are in full effect and display, and there isn't one works to the benefit of its consumers. Why is it that all choices are left without the benefit of those choosing, and all of society gives no option to the benefit of itself? What does it mean to be scant of enough resources to establish your own sovereignty in decision making, and be robbed entirely of the ability to benefit yourself, your community, your country, and more widely -- human beings as a whole? What prevents any initiative that isn't self-serving or serving an elite from taking foot, and instead co-opting and redirecting all initiatives against you?What do I mean, narratives against you?—"

078 55 PHIL INFO THE SITUATION "II. Narratives Turned Against You

We are living in a world where information and its narrative virality is thrown in front of our faces, and reinforced through psychological manipulation that drowns our ability to reconsider it - and we are effectively helpless to alternatives, and are forced to adapt the frameworks put forth as alternative algorithms. We are victims of our demographic, and played as such — with our actions being narrowly defined and strongly reinforced through a predictable tunnel in context to who and where we are - which would precisely inform predictive analysis.Think about it — how many people are in this world? To whom do you listen to, and craft your perspectives from? One source? Two? Even the most generously diverse of our viewpoints would consistently be derived of 10 maybe 20 tops for the unusually considering person.Bluntly, there would be a strong incentive in context to the growth of capital to continually reinforce predictability in large populations — as well as in context to domestic policy, because they are two sides of the same coin.

—"

079 56 PHIL;CRIT THE SITUATION "III. The Illusion of Alternatives

Even then, these sources may or may not care about your viewpoint. What 99% of them do, is not develop a viable solution to your problems, but instead exploit human need for conflict resolution, without conflict — or resolution.It is a similar affect of one playing a video game, in which our system of incentives (capital) reinforces what makes a video game more likely to be purchased. All mainstream block-buster video games exploit the neurological need to solve a problem; but video games allow the juicing of the feeling of being on the precipice of solving a fictional problem for as long as possible to delay resolution - and continue stringing you along deeper and deeper, in which your brain believes there will be a resolution around the corner, but instead - there are side missions. After the side missions there are hidden maps. And now, most recently, there are expansion packs and new characters to be expected - all delaying any sense of resolution, and tricking your brain to thinking the problem your are solving has some meaning - enough for them to string you along to Game Part 2.—"

080 57 PHIL;CRIT INFO THE SITUATION "IV. Cognitive Warfare as Political Control

Likewise, the cognitive warfare placed on our mode of political thought and actions use the same concept. Consider your pent up political angst to be a valve of problems that you have the willpower and capacity to resolve. Our natural tendency to understand what resources are available to solve these things keep us looking for resources to be able to address these problems, because we understand we lack the resources individually — groups, leadership, information — and what we often find are like minded political commentators that share our frustrations, our beliefs, our tendencies of thought — and, our mind seeing our thoughts being echoed back to us - gives us the illusion that our problems are being solved. It delays all aspects of solution from being actually implemented. Why —(consider not using analogies) This phenomenon of the brain has been exploited in all facets of life, and are all equally consequential.